hole or cavity for any range of temperature and pressure during operation of the molding machine. Keebles and other prior art workers design compressed or annealed carbon gaskets for the purpose of providing a gasket with high compression strength. Typically, compressed gaskets include a thin sheet of carbon which has been mass welded and compressed to form the gasket. In the process of mass welding, a carbon sheet is placed face down on a thin steel strip. A gasket is then formed by the pressing together of the strips and the thin sheet. The resulting thin sheet is then placed face down on a steel block. The steel block is placed in a machine, and a punch is then used to form a hole in the slab of steel. After the sheet of carbon gasket is set in the hole, the punch is removed, and the resulting hole is filled with an annealing powder. The sheet of carbon with the annealed powder is then tamped under light pressure until the die hole is packed with carbon/powder. The compressed gasket is then baked to fix the powder. Compressed gaskets formed in this manner require that the carbon sheet be tamped into a die hole or cavity. If the compressed gasket is too hard, the compressed gasket may not recover its self-expandability when released from the molding machine after baking, causing damage of the molding machine. On the other hand, if the compressed gasket is too soft after baking, the compressed gasket may not have sufficient compression strength. To ensure proper compression, Keebles and other practitioners in the art form a compressed gasket with an excessively large amount of annealing powder so that the compressed gasket is somewhat soft after baking. However, this practice requires that care be taken in handling the compressed gasket. If the compressed gasket is dropped, the compressed gasket will shrink and lose its original shape. It will no longer
