Graphics professionals also use Adobe Creative Suite, which includes Photoshop as well as the programs described in the following sections (plus other programs). Creative Suite has a large team of photographers, graphic designers, illustrators, and other pros who oversee the entire process of designing a finished creative product. Getting your hands on Photoshop A single license for Photoshop and the other programs in Adobe Creative Suite costs $1,000, plus tax. For individual users, the $650

Adobe offers a 60-day money back guarantee if you aren't satisfied. Downloading Photoshop The Photoshop file for the program and installer is approximately 4.8 GB in size. To download the program, you can use an Internet connection to a Web server (see the upcoming "Stuff to consider before downloading Photoshop" sidebar for details about this). Alternatively, you can order a boxed CD or DVD from Adobe at the following URL: After you download Photoshop, you can install the program by double-clicking the installer file. The installer program prepares your computer for use with Photoshop. After installation is complete, you can run Photoshop immediately. Vast Amount of RAM Needed You can install Photoshop on your computer regardless of your RAM or hard disk drive size. However, you may need a large RAM or hard disk size to accommodate Photoshop's large files and complicated features. In most cases, I recommend a MacBook or laptop with at least 4 GB of RAM. A high-end MacBook Pro with 16 GB of RAM is recommended. However, you may need to upgrade to a more powerful computer if you work with large, high-resolution digital images or if you work with graphics intensive applications such as Illustrator or Dreamweaver. See the section "Dealing with RAM," earlier in this chapter, for more information. Use Photoshop as a beginner After you get your feet wet with Photoshop, you can graduate to more

Suboptimal bone mineral density and low traumatic spinal fractures. A prospective study was conducted in order to investigate the relationship between bone mineral density and spinal fractures in female patients. The material consisted of all newly admitted female patients (n = 83) to a geriatric ward with a diagnosis of spinal fractures. Bone mineral density was measured at lumbar vertebral bodies in 66 of these 83 patients. Osteoporosis was found in 34% of the study group. Of the patients with spinal fractures 20% had osteoporosis. It is concluded that spinal fractures are associated with suboptimal bone mineral density in about 20% of cases. Q: Why does this statement change a referenced object? Bone fractures remain one of the most common injuries resulting in acute pain, hospitalization, and disability. Fragility fractures of the proximal femur are especially concerning given the associated morbidity, mortality, and high cost of care associated with them. Hip fractures are estimated to cost $8 billion in the United States (Nathanson et al., 2002). These fractures occur as a result of low-energy trauma in the elderly, leading to a disease of increasing prevalence. Treatment of the patient with a proximal femur fracture has historically revolved around surgical fixation, with the goal of restoring fracture alignment and early ambulation. This fracture presents a problem of a considerable magnitude in the elderly and presents a therapeutic dilemma. If the fracture is treated conservatively, it is possible for the fracture to remain asymptomatic, but with a possibility of gradual collapse. In contrast, surgery is associated with high morbidity, and the patient loses between 6- and 27% of the bone density in the first year after the fracture (Ziebarth, et al., 1993). Therefore, a conservative treatment is frequently chosen for those older than 65 years. On the other hand, while surgery is also associated with considerable morbidity, the younger adult patient is frequently treated with surgery, as it is frequently associated with a higher functional status. The majority of hip fractures occur in older persons, and the elderly are known to have less bone mineral density than younger adults. A result of this is a greater likelihood of a fall, or of a fracture, with an associated decrease in bone mineral density. Furthermore, osteopenia is associated with an increased risk for hip fractures, and a decreased bone mineral density is associated with increased mortality. With regard to osteoporosis, it is well known that hip fractures have a surprisingly high rate of subsequent fracture, perhaps up to twice the rate of most of the other bones in the body (Felson et al., 1997). The likelihood of a fracture of the same bone depends upon the degree of bone mineral density. Since the chance of fracture is a function of the force applied to the bone, a fracture may be prevented by decreasing the mechanical stresses placed upon the fracture. Therefore, there is a need for alternative methods of treating a hip fracture which do not have the consequences associated with the traditional surgical methods of treatment. One of the more promising methods for treatment of hip fractures is the use of a bone matrix product to augment the fracture, or to fill the defect created by fracture. Thus, there is a
